TUESDAY EVENING, JUNE 4

CANINE CUNNING.—The following is from a correspondent: A near neighbor of mine has a large mongrel dog, a terrible nuisance to all passing the house, which unfortunately stands near the highway. The brute has the nasty habit or rushing out and attacking every passing vehicle. Complaints were loud and numerous; and at length the owner hit upon a plan which he thought would effectually cure his dog. He attached a small log of wood or a "clog" by a chain to his collar. This answered admirably; for no sooner did the dog start in pursuit of anything than the clog not only checked his speed, but generally rolled him over into the bargain.

Now this would not do.

Doggie was evidently puzzled, and reflected upon the position; and if he did not possess reasoning powers, he certainly showed somereasoning powers, he certainly showed some-thing very like them, for he quickly overcame the difficulty, and to the surprise of all, was soon at his old work, nearly as bad as ever. And this is how he managed. No longer did he at-tempt to drag the clog on the ground and allow it to check and upset him, but before starting he caugh it up in his mouth, ran before the passing horse, dropped it, and commenced the attack; and when distanced, would again seize the clog in his mouth, and resume his position ahead, and thus become as great a pest as ever. Even on his ordinary travels about he is now seen carrying his clog in his mouth, instead of letting it drag on the ground between his legs.— N. Y Sun
